Marketing is an Investment – Make sure it delivers results

February 20, 2014 by Alex Makin. |

For many businesses and organisations, marketing is more often than not, regarded as an expense, rather than being viewed as an investment. Marketing should be measurable so you can track your return on investment. It is critical not to haphazardly spend on marketing, but to be guided through a plan that identifies opportunities and mitigates risks.

A marketing plan is the guide that identifies how you can achieve outcomes, such as increased sales, growth in market share and ways to improve the design and distribution of your product or service. A marketing plan will also provide you with metrics so you know how to measure your success and outcomes.

Unfortunately, far too many businesses and organisations ignore the need for a marketing plan. Instead these organisations implement individual marketing and communications tools, such as advertising, websites and social media without considering how best to reach and motivate target audiences. Outcomes are always going to be diminished when there is no cohesive strategy. Furthermore, this approach fails to take into account potential constraints, such as the need to collect relevant market intelligence, or sales training, to better service customers and to demonstrate responsiveness.

The start of Rotary—the world owes these men
a great deal!

President Phil has suggested that on

Sunday 2 March 2014

the club participates in

"Clean-up Australia Day."

We want you!

This would be done by attending at Phil's lovely estate and spending time to walk around and collect any rubbish or other irrelevant items we see on the way.

Phil has also suggested that we could breakfast at his home, either before or after the clean-up.

Would you please therefore put this event into your diary, and indicate interest and commitment as soon as possible.
